With the rapid advance of technology, and an increasing number of books available to read online or as electronic books, many people are asking whether the traditional paper book has come to the end of its life. There are many advantages to electronic books: they are always available through our smartphones, so there is no longer any need to carry around heavy books. In addition, owners of paper books need to find space in their home to store and organise their collection. However, storage is not an issue for electronic editions. Some schools have taken the decision to replace textbooks with digital material, making full use of the wide range of educational resources now available through the internet. On the other hand, bookshops still exist, the sale of paper books over the internet has grown, and it is clear that readers still like to feel a real book in their hands. A book can be a beautiful object, pleasing to the eye and decorative on the shelf. It would be interesting to know how much the physical appearance of a book influences our choice of reading material.
