If you were asked to provide proof of identity, you would probably show a passport, an identity card or a driving licence. Any of these documents will give your personal details: your name, date of birth, nationality and possibly your address. There will also be an identification number which is unique to you, as well as your photograph. These components define your identity in law, but they say nothing about you as a person, especially as this information can be stolen and used by someone else to pretend to be you. What is it that marks your true identity? Is it the clothes you wear or the school you went to? Is it the money you earn, the size of your house or who your parents are? Is it how hard-working or ambitious you are? The answer is: all of these and none! These aspects of your life are important, but they do not tell others about your character: the way you treat people, what your passions and interests are, or how you view the world. That is your real personality, and it cannot be taken away.
